He bent eagerly over the cold white hand which she held out to him, but it was some moments before he could speak. Oh, mother, he said at last, why are you here? I told you in my note, Marcus, that yesterday was the eleventh of June. But you will come back with me, he said, to your son s house, will you not? To Castletown? No, not yet! And where can you stop here? Not in one of those graves, Marcus; you need not look at them so curiously. I am not a vampire yet, not quite; but come, you were always a dutiful son, you shall see your mother s palace; in its apartments, spacious as they are, we can talk, perhaps, more at our ease than here. Come with me. The same grating mockery was in her tone as of old. Without speaking, he followed her in through the arched door that opened upon the narrow stairs which Annie had tried first that morning. On the first step she paused and lit a lantern she had carried unlighted until then. He could see, by its help, that her tall and still erect figure was clothed in the commonest dress of the country; hut he could see too that it was thinner and more worn-looking than ever he had known it...
