The only changes in the alphabet were the promiscuous use of b and ft, and the use of th for either after 1300. 5. There was a general softening of the consonants, especially in the Southern dialect, and throat sounds were eipelled. 6. Nouns had lost most of their case-endings, declensions were reduced, and gender followed sex. 7. Adjectives lost nearly all their endings, and the distinction between definite and indefinite was obscured. 8. The indefinite article came into use; the definite article was simplified. 9. Pronouns also were simplified in their declension; kwo and hwat began to be used as relatives. 10. Verbs showed the common preference for the letter-e in the forms bindeth, binden, loved, etc. 11. Prepositions were used more frequently, and more attention was given to the order of words. 12. Rhyme was introduced, and alliteration gradually disappeared. III.-SECOND MIDDLE ENGLISH. 1362-1500 A.d. 1. Chaucer s English.--As First Middle English is the English of Layamon and Ormin, so Second Middle English is that of Chaucer and Gower. Between Layamon and Chaucer there was an interval of nearly two centuries, during which the language underwent great changes gradually. In some respects the latest writers of the former period (for example, Langlande and Wyclif) differed nearly as much from Layamon as Chaucer did. But there ia this great difference between Chaucer and nearly all his contemporaries, that whereas they wrote only a dialect of English, he wrote what was or very soon became...
