To get to the station I step into a public omnibus passing my dwelling, without saying a word. Has this stepping-in any legal consequence--and what? 2. Would stepping into the carriage of a friend, who is taking me for a drive, have also legal consequences? What is the distinction between the two cases? 3. What position in a legal view does the conductor of the omnibus in the above case occupy? Does the Omnibus Company incur liability merely in respect of the contract I have made with the conductor? Or also for his delicts--for example, where he has appropriated a travelling-bag forgotten by me or deliberately given me too little change? 4. Also, where he has done the latter unwittingly? 5. Is the legal position of the driver the same as that of the conductor? Or is there a distinction in respect of the services they both perform for the Company? Does the position of the driver alter when there is no conductor? 6. Does any claim arise in respect of luggage which the passenger has given up, i.e. delivered over to the conductor (driver), and which the latter has packed on the top of the omnibus, and by what action would he make it good? 7. Also for those things which the passenger carries with him, and which are stolen from him in the omnibus? 7 a. Owing to the omnibus being upset the passenger s effects are...
