Excerpt: . iii. arcady in some phases of her faith. The Nineteenth Century, November, 1882. The hero in Lord Tennyson s Princess tells us that he suffered all his life from an inconvenient hereditary weakness: Waking dreams were, more or less, An old and strange affection of the house. The infirmity was a serious one, and at a critical moment of the young prince s career it entailed upon him consequences which might almost be described as humiliating. In the shock of the conflict where all was at stake--Like a flash the weird affection came; King, camp, and college turned to hollow shows. He seemed to move in old memorial tilts And, doing battle with forgotten hosts, To dream himself the shadow of a dream. Whether the Laureate be describing phenomena known to him by his own experience I cannot tell, but I myself am only too familiar with the weird affection indicated. As I wander in my solitary rambles past the old haunts of men, long since deserted of inhabitants, and stop to follow the traces of some moated grange, or camp, or byre, I find myself raising up the dead from their graves, and passing them through their paces in wild dance or solemn pageantry. I often think that one of the joys of the life hereafter will consist in being permitted to project oneself at will into remote periods in the past, and to hold converse with primeval man at one time,...
